Appraisal came in $14,000 short. Seller kept every dollar.

swipe

What's inside

- Who actually orders it
- Low number, unchanged price
- The $14,000 answer
- Cap versus waive
- The deadline nobody reads

The Appraisal Is Not Yours

You pay for it. The lender orders it and owns the result.

It exists to protect the loan amount, not the price you agreed to.

Which changes who blinks first.

Low Value Is Not A Discount

The lender funds off the appraised number. Your contract price stays exactly where it was.

Nothing about a low appraisal automatically lowers what you owe the seller.

One buyer paid it anyway.

Where The $14,000 Went

That buyer had signed an appraisal gap clause agreeing to cover a shortfall in cash.

So the price never moved. The $14,000 came straight out of their savings at closing.

Almost nobody reads the cap.

Cap It, Do Not Waive It

Waiving means you cover any shortfall, however big it turns out to be.

Capping sets a ceiling you pick. It still beats most competing offers.

Ceiling is not the only lever.

The Clock You Missed

In Texas the right to walk after a low appraisal lives on its own addendum with its own deadline.

Blow past that date and your earnest money quietly stops being yours.

You can size this risk early.

Comment

TOUR

and I'll DM you

the gap clause wording I use, the addendum deadline checklist, and the exact payment breakdown at each cap amount

Save this for later.