

You lose 3 of your 7
walk away days.

What's inside

- What the fee buys
- Where 3 days vanish
- Nobody owes you repairs
- Money beats handyman work
- How to actually terminate

You Are Buying Time

The option fee is not a deposit. It buys you the right to walk for any reason at all.

It is small money for the strongest position you will have in the whole deal.

Almost nobody spends it right.

Where Your 3 Days Go

The clock counts weekends and holidays. It does not pause because it is Sunday.

A good inspector is booked two or three days out. So 3 of your 7 days are gone before anyone steps inside the house.

The report is not the finish line.

Nobody Owes You Repairs

A seller can read your inspection report and do absolutely nothing. That is allowed.

The report is information. It is not a to do list they signed up for.

How you ask changes the answer.

Ask For Money Instead

A seller under deadline pressure hires the cheapest guy who can come Thursday.

Ask for a credit or a price cut and you pick your own contractor after closing.

There is a wrong week for that.

Verbal Means Nothing

Telling your agent you are out is not termination. Notice has to be delivered in writing before the deadline.

Miss it by one hour and you own the contract, with your earnest money sitting on the table.

Day one decides most of this.

Comment

TOUR

and I'll DM you
the day by day option period timeline,
including how the deadline is counted
and the exact notice wording

Save this for later.