

Most transplants misjudge Texas
by exactly 47
minutes

What's inside

- The 47 minute miss
- Tax math flips
- August is its own season
- Schools by street
- The weekend problem

The 47 Minutes

On a map, twelve miles looks like nothing.

In Austin or DFW at 5pm, that same twelve miles runs 47 minutes each way. Almost eight hours a week gone.

People pick the house before they drive the route once.

That is not the expensive part.

The Tax Flip

No state income tax gets everyone excited on the flight in.

Then the property tax bill lands and the math looks very different depending on which side of a county line you bought on.

Your bills are not done yet.

August Is A Season

It is not one hot month. It is a stretch where the ground pulls away from the slab and your electric use doubles.

Locals water the foundation.

Newcomers do not know that is a thing.

One street can change everything.

Schools By Street

Two houses on the same road can feed two different schools.

Boundaries also get redrawn, and growth in San Antonio and north of DFW means they get redrawn often.

Then there is the fun problem.

The Weekend Problem

The coast, the Hill Country, and the good barbecue are all within a few hours, and the line starts before you wake up.

Where you live decides how many of those you actually do instead of talk about.

Most transplants learn this year three.

Comment

PLAN

and I'll DM you

a city by city breakdown for San Antonio, Austin, and DFW with real commute times, tax rates, and your exact payment math

Save this for later.